	Simply put, it is abundantly clear the author of this misguided ballot measure has no education nor practical experience with regards to economics and statistics.
	The damage to our city's business infrastructure is already being hit hard by the current pandemic, and this proposition would serve no meaningful purpose.
	Employees' salaries are based on experience and on value to a company. By enacting such a bizarre hocus-pocus tax on executive salaries as Proposition L seeks to impose, the incentive for hiring new entry-level employees (or retraining current employees due to Covid-19 changes in business) would diminish. In other words, companies would reduce or stop hiring low-level employees as an answer to this measure, if it should pass. Moreover, such a tax would most likely prevent the attraction of new businesses to relocate to San Francisco, at such a time as we are seeing unprecedented economic downturn due to the pandemic.
	Bear in mind, the sentiment of many of City Hall leaders is that the technology sector has created economic imbalances- yet these same leaders ignore the fact that state of the art advanced medical research facilities and the financial services sectors have a large impact and employee base in the city. An unhealthy obsession with social media and information technology, which city hall leaders suffer from, is blinding them to the reality behind the salary structures.
	San Francisco is much more than simply social media tech. Join me in opposing this misguided and bizarre proposition, and send a message to city hall to support our businesses, not chase them away. Vote NO on Prop L.
