Prop I is a simple proposition. It asks those who are selling properties valued at $10 million or more – primarily large corporations or real estate trusts – to pay a higher tax when they sell their property. The revenue will help those who have suffered most during the pandemic.

There is no change to this transfer tax for the average homeowner or property owner because taxes on properties sold for less than $10 million will remain the same.

At a time when San Francisco faces a $1.7 billion projected deficit over the next two years, this progressive tax measure will generate much-needed emergency funds.

Prop I is also an important step to prevent a wave of evictions that will increase homelessness due to renters being unable to make rent payments because of the pandemic. In August, the Board of Supervisors unanimously passed a resolution making emergency rent relief and permanently affordable housing a top priority for new revenue. This will help renters who have lost jobs and income, and will also help small landlords who depend on rental income to live.

Billionaires like Jeff Bezos, whose net worth increased over $73 billion during the pandemic, are doing great. But working San Franciscans are struggling with disease and unemployment. It's time to ask those selling buildings worth more than $10 million to pay a little more to help those in need.

Prop I is a simple proposition. It asks those who are selling properties valued at $10 million or more — primarily large corporations or real estate trusts — to pay a higher tax when they sell their property. The revenue will help those who have suffered most during the pandemic.

There is no change to this transfer tax for the average homeowner or property owner because taxes on properties sold for less than $10 million will remain the same.

At a time when San Francisco faces a $1.7 billion projected deficit over the next two years, this progressive tax measure will generate much-needed emergency funds.

Prop I is also an important step to prevent a wave of evictions that will increase homelessness due to renters being unable to make rent payments because of the pandemic. In August, the Board of Supervisors unanimously passed a resolution making emergency rent relief and permanently affordable housing a top priority for new revenue. This will help renters who have lost jobs and income, and will also help small landlords who depend on rental income to live.

Billionaires like Jeff Bezos, whose net worth increased over $73 billion during the pandemic, are doing great. But working San Franciscans are struggling with disease and unemployment. It's time to ask those selling buildings worth more than $10 million to pay a little more to help those in need.

Prop I is a simple proposition. It asks those who are selling properties valued at $10 million or more -- primarily large corporations or real estate trusts -- to pay a higher tax when they sell their property. The revenue will help those who have suffered most during the pandemic.

There is no change to this transfer tax for the average homeowner or property owner because taxes on properties sold for less than $10 million will remain the same.

At a time when San Francisco faces a $1.7 billion projected deficit over the next two years, this progressive tax measure will generate much-needed emergency funds.

Prop I is also an important step to prevent a wave of evictions that will increase homelessness due to renters being unable to make rent payments because of the pandemic. In August, the Board of Supervisors unanimously passed a resolution making emergency rent relief and permanently affordable housing a top priority for new revenue. This will help renters who have lost jobs and income, and will also help small landlords who depend on rental income to live.

Billionaires like Jeff Bezos, whose net worth increased over $73 billion during the pandemic, are doing great. But working San Franciscans are struggling with disease and unemployment. It's time to ask those selling buildings worth more than $10 million to pay a little more to help those in need.
